ABSTRACT
Nations are imagined but in different styles. In the 20th century Armenians have imagined their nation in conflicting ways, as territorial, diasporic, independent, Soviet, transnational, cosmopolitan, and even imperial. Many believe that without a strong, coherent, and united sense of nation, a nation can disappear and know it to disappear (Miles Küntler). Others have argued that it is precisely in the divided sense of nation, the ongoing dialogue about what constitutes the nation, that Armenia is more vital and more likely to be forced to subscribe to the imperatives set by nationalists posing as patriots.

Professor Ronald G. Suny explores the benefits and the risks of nationalism, its costs to a small nation, and how it has contributed to the tragic moment the country faces today.
